Description

The alder is typical for riparian forests and banks of slow-flowing streams. The wood is discreetly grained. Tangentially decorative drawings in the wood as well as radially delicate stripes are produced by faintly marked annual ring boundaries. Characteristic of this reddish-white, reddish-yellow to reddish-brown wood are frequently occurring pith flecks.

Trunk and bark

The alder tree reaches heights of up to 20m and more, with the trunk being free of branches up to about 15m. Diameters go up to 1m, but are usually smaller and only up to about 0.5m. The bark is greenish in young alder, later changing to dark brown and becoming quite cracked.

Characteristics and wood colour

The annual rings are of different widths and the false pith rays appear as mirrors in radial section and as darker longitudinal stripes in tangential section. Pore arrangement scattered and small. The sapwood and heartwood are indistinguishable in alder. The wood is reddish-white to yellow-red, but darkens quickly when exposed to light and air. Alder wood is often used as an imitation for precious woods.
